The name is Martin...Aston Martin

In film classics like Goldfinger, Thunderball, GoldenEye, Tomorrow Never Dies, Casino Royale, Skyfall and No Time to Die, nobody does it better than James Bond 007 in the driver's seat of his Aston Martin DB5 Coupe! With its smashing good looks, the DB5 is the car of choice for the suave MI6 agent when it comes to taking on his most dangerous adversaries. The gadget-laden DB5 Coupe—complete with bumper-mounted machine guns, revolving number plates, bullet-proof shield and an ejector seat roof panel—is considered the most famous spy car in the world by historians and collectors alike.

A symbol of British sophistication

British automaker Aston Martin first introduced the DB5—named for company owner Sir David Brown—in 1963. Conceived as a grand tourer by Italian design house Carrozzeria

Touring Superleggera, only 1,021 DB5s were produced between 1963 and 1965. A speedy, high-performance sports car, the DB5 boasted a 4.0-liter inline six-cylinder engine capable of an impressive 282 horsepower and 288 lb-ft. of torque.

With its sleek lines and classic proportions, it was no surprise the DB5 ideally suited 007's refined tastes and love for the finer things in life.

Sold at auction for over $6 million

Making headlines in August 2019, one of just two existing 1965 Aston Martin DB5s commissioned by Eon Productions to promote the 007 film Thunderball sold at auction through RM Sotheby for a record-shattering $6.38 million. Today, a fully restored mid-1960s Aston Martin DB5 in pristine condition can fetch upwards of $1.3 million, making the ultimate spy car one of the world's most priceless treasures.
